Howard University
Communication, Culture & Media Studies Department
Tenure-track Assistant Professor Position

Description
The Department of Communication, Culture and Media Studies seeks to fill a tenure-track position at the Assistant Professor level in critical media and communication studies. We are seeking a critical research scholar who can teach a range of doctoral-level courses in communication theory and research methods, and both oversee and serve on dissertation committees. Applicants should have substantive knowledge in at least two of the following: media industries, communication policy, audience research, political economy of communication, media globalization, communication technologies, or media and social movements. Incorporation of multicultural concerns, e.g., gender, race, ethnicity, socio-economic class, sexuality and/or nationality, in the applicant’s research agenda is essential. Responsibilities would include teaching 4-6 courses per year, mentoring students in their research, serving on dissertation committees, participating in other administrative committees, carrying on a full program of research, and exercising leadership within the broader profession.

Qualifications
Applicants should possess an earned doctorate in a communications field or a related discipline. The ideal candidate will have teaching experience and a publications track record, as well as demonstrated promise for research and publication. Applicants should also possess an understanding of the broader field of communications as well as specific knowledge in mass communications, as listed above.

The Department, School and University
The Department of Communication, Culture and Media Studies (CCMS) offers doctoral-level studies leading to the Ph.D. The person hired will help to build the critical component in the CCMS program through course re/development, by carrying on an active program of scholarship and publication, and through mentorship of students. The department has a diverse community of approximately 50 doctoral students from the United States and other nations, and a core faculty of five, with additional affiliate faculty from other departments in the recently restructured School of Communications. The School of Communications is an interdisciplinary unit composed of two undergraduate departments (Strategic, Legal and Management Communications; and Media, Journalism and Film) and two graduate departments (Communication, Culture and Media Studies; and Communication Sciences and Disorders).

Howard University is a private research university comprising 13 schools and colleges. A historically Black institution in Washington, D.C, Howard was created by the Congress of the United States in 1967 to educate and otherwise advance African Americans and those from other underserved populations. Howard produces the largest number of African American recipients of doctoral degrees on campus than any other institution in the United States. In keeping with Howard’s mission, the CCMS Department is committed to preparing academicians and research professionals to assume positions of leadership both nationally and internationally. Applicants must demonstrate an understanding for and support of Howard University’s mission.
Application process
Send (1) a letter of application, (2) a current curriculum vitae, and (3) three current letters of reference to:

Dr. Carolyn M. Byerly, chair
Department of Communication, Culture & Media Studies
School of Communications
Howard University
525 Bryant St. NW
Washington, DC 20059

Review of applications begins immediately. The new hire will begin either January or August 2015, depending on availability.

Howard University is an affirmative action, equal opportunity employer.